We have compiled an identification and value guide for 1990 Marvel trading cards, as well as a buying and selling guide to help you out on your retro trading card quest. Marvel Universe Cards: Background Marvel Universe Cards were first published in 1990 by the company Impel (later known as SkyBox International Inc.), and are also known as Series 1 in the Marvel Universe collectible trading cards series. The card set featured a total of 162 cards jam-packed with key Marvel Universe collectible trading cards series. of the card, depicted in beautiful graphic artwork. The back of the cards displayed important information like real names, origin stories, a "did you know" section and critical win-loss statistics. Some of the key themes included on this card set are 12 "Spiderman Presents" cards, a card featuring Stan Lee, multiple trading cards within the same category (e.g. 3 Spiderman cards within the Super Hero category), and nicknames! Following the success of Series 1 in 1990, another four series were released between 1991 and 1994. The cards focused on specific characters, events, or the work of particular artists such as Andy and Adam Kubert. 1990 Marvel Card: Identification And Value Before finding out how much 1990 Marvel cards are worth, its important to identify card types and subsets. Once you know what you're looking for (or what you're looking to sell), you can easily do a little market research to find out their current value. Each card pack was sold with 12 cards, and limited-edition factory boxes were sold with 36 cards. Usually, each box contained one hologram card. The first series was published by Impel in 1990. The cards featured categories such as Super Heroes, Super Villains, Rookies, Famous Battles and Team Pictures. Two years later, Impel negotiated with DC Cosmic Cards. On the front of each card in the 1990 series, a character or event was featured. This series offered several things that future series would not include. Such features were the 12 "Spider-Man Presents:" cards. In these cards, Spider-Man would conduct a humorous interview with other characters in the Marvel Universe, such as Doctor Doom, Doctor Octopus, the Hulk, Silver Surfer, Thor, the Punisher, Magneto, Captain America, Dr. Strange, Iron Man, Wolverine and Spider-Man. This is also the only series that offered nicknames, win-loss records, and a trading card of Stan Lee. Other categories in the same category. In this series, win-loss records were removed in favor of having meant. Later, such as Speed, Stamina, Intelligence, Strength, Agility and Durability was rated for each character on a scale of 1 through 7. Series II also included three trading cards explaining what each rating meant. Later, these explanation were simply printed on the inside of the wrapper in which the cards were packaged. The Famous Battle category was now renamed Arch-Enemies, to highlight particular rivalries as opposed to single confrontations. Spider-Man Presents was also removed. Instead, two new categories were introduced, but would not appear again in the future. These one time only categories were Legends and Weapons, Legends paid tribute to characters that had died such as Kraven the Hunter or Bucky. Weapons gave a statistical look at weaponry such as Spider-Man's Web Shooters, Wolverine's Claws, Daredevils Billy Club and the Ultimate Nullifier. The Marvel Universe Series II Hologram Cards (unlike Series I) featured artwork that was different from the feature character's regular card. H-1: Spider-Man H-2: Hulk H-3: Punisher H-4: Doctor Doom H-5: Fantastic Four vs. Mole Man During this year, there were 205 trading cards including the traditional five Holograms. Each hologram was tinted a different color, for example, Wolverine was tinted blue and Hulk was tinted green. This series did not have the lasting success of the previous two base series, of 1990-1991; this is evident in the cards collectability years later (Citation needed, conflicting information easily found with simple research). The series did introduced new elements of design. Instead of having the "Did You Know?" fun fact on the back of each card (like series I and II both did), Series II featured a quote from each character. Several new categories were also introduced. Team-ups (cards displaying interesting pairings of two particular characters), Cosmic Being (cards showcasing characters that hail from outer space), the Origins card category that focused on specific character origins, and Milestones, which emphasized events in the Marvel Universe. The background artwork for each card was an outer space scene which fitted together across adjacent cards. Limited edition factory tins (numbered to 10,000) were later sold that contained the full set of cards as well as an additional "power ratings" card. H-1: Hulk H-2: Thing H-3: Wolverine H-4: Venom H-5: Ghost Rider This set featured 179 base cards plus the checklist. It also had a 9 card red foil chase set featuring characters from the Marvel 2099 comics. It also had one very rare hologram featuring a Spider-Man vs Venom battle (with either red, green, or the highly sought-after blue tint). This card was inserted into 1 of every 180 packs, or 1 in every 5 boxes. This set was noteworthy because 135 of the 180 base set cards were portions of larger 9 card pictures. Thus, when the cards were put into standard 9 card sheets, the cards formed a large, contiguous, image. There were also 9 cards of "Unsolved Mysteries" such as Wolverine's origin or the identity of the 6th member of the Infinity Watch. The remaining cards featured famous battles of heroes vs villains and also heroes. The Red foil 2099 cards are notorious for having weird ghostly ugly dark hazing on some of the cards. However, these focused on specific comic book crossovers such as Fatal Attractions and Maximum Carnage. The backs of the cards summarized the progression of the cards (200 cards total) were of this style. The majority of the cards were simply an alphabetic organization of heroes and villains (including Marvel 2099 cards, which played a more prominent role here). For chase cards, this set had four holograms, 10 "suspended animation" cards (characters printed on clear plastic cards, used to promote the animated series running at the time), and nine "power blast" cards (foil/holofoil). The power blast cards came in three variants, having gold, silver, or rainbow backgrounds, depending on where the cards were purchased. The holograms came in three variants, red/dark orange tint, green/gold tint, and green/blue tint. An uncut "Promo Sheet" was distributed featuring Sabertooth, Rogue, Hawkeye and Punisher. 1: Carnage 2: Punisher 3: Ghost Rider 4: Gambit 5: Hulk 6: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 10: Wolverine 1: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 10: Wolverine 1: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 4: Silver Surfer 6: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 10: Wolverine 1: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 10: Wolverine 1: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: War Machine 1: Spider-Man 7: Thing 8: Venom 9: V Marvel.com Complete scans of Marvel Universe Series 2 at Marvel.com Complete scans of Marvel Universe Series 3 at Marvel.com Complete checklists for $9.99 a month!Get Marvel UnlimitedCheck out the newest Marvel comics coming out this week!Release Calendar Bartholomew Kuma's backstory has taken One Piece fans to one of the most infamous events in the series' history: the God Valley Incident. Welcome back to CBR's ongoing look at Marvel's trading cards of yesteryear! After kicking things off last time with a look at 1990's Marvel Universe I series, we're taking a step forward and looking at the series' followup set: 1991's Marvel Universe II. These are the cards with the flashiest art, the kookiest stats, the most random lineups, and even a few film stars decades before their big break! If you're a comic book fan with roots in the halcyon, pre-bubble bursting days of the '90s, this ongoing series of nostalgic lists will be your bread and butter. So kick back, grab your trusty Trapper-Keeper and an ice-cold can of JOLT cola as we refresh your memory with the best superhero trading Cards: 15 Greats From Marvel Universe I 15 Daredevil As one of Marvel's perennially critically acclaimed series, you can rarely go wrong with Daredevil. And when it comes to trading cards, you can't really go wrong with a Daredevil that's drawn by John Romita Jr. himself. At this point in 1991, the legendary artist had already turned in game-changing runs on "Iron Man," "Amazing Spider-Man" and "Uncanny X-Men." He'd also just completed a hellacious run on "Daredevil" with writer Ann Nocenti. Romita Jr. ended his epic, three-year run just a little while before this card came out. A look at the back of Daredevil's card reveals that a lot has changed from Marvel Universe I. For one thing, all of those totally made up battle stats are gone. Instead, they've been replaced with something that will become a standard for pretty much every one of these sets moving forward: power ratings. As the name implies, these ratings measured how powerful each character really was, thus spurring plenty of debate about whether or not X could beat Y. And while DD here is normal in the strength and speed department (garnering a measly score of "2"), he's way more agile than your average man. Of course, one has to wonder how Murdock's holding down a 2 in intelligence with that Columbia law degree. Ah yes, when you think of Namor the Sub-Mariner, this is how you imagine him -- riding a mythological beast like a bucking mechanized bronco in a honky tonk. In reality, that's the character cleverly known as the Griffin, who at this time in the early '90s had been reduced to a simple-minded beast. Rather than showing off an evergreen, glamorous hero shot of Namor, this card instead shows a very brief period of time, Namor rode the Griffin around like a flying horse. Here is where you see some of those power rankings really show off. Namor's one of the strongest and most durable heroes in the MU, even if -- as his bio states -- his strength fades the longer he's out of the water. The card also documents his early '90s status quo as an environmental warrior with the power of a massive corporation behind him. Don't worry about that "Did You Know" fact, by the way, the ankle wings did grow back. The X-Men dominated the sales charts for most of the '80s, but the early '90s -- specifically 1991 -- is when the franchise really broke out. This trading card set documents that by including the first cards for characters like Cable, Gambit, Psylocke and Jubilee (among many others). This Tom Morgan-illustrated card shows an iconic Cable look: gritted teeth, big shoulder pads and a totally impractical gun. Seriously, does that thing double as a deadly dust-buster or something? As Cable had only debuted a few months prior to this set's release, little was known about him, which you can tell from the lack of real stats. His name is unknown and the card doesn't even mention the fact that he's from the future. In its defense, those bits of information were still a year or so away from being revealed. This is also where it's worth pointing out that the initial "power rankings" failed to include "fighting ability," a decision that makes some heroes seem downright weak. Not Cable, though; dude's still got mad stamina. Oh and he's smarter than Daredevil! Considering just how big of a role they both played in the X-Men in the early '90s, it's hard to separate Jim Lee from Gambit. This badass card, illustrated by Lee, proves that these two were made for each other. Here's the thing: Gambit's costume is ridiculous. A metallic blue bib over a hot pink armored top, a blue pipe for a belt all topped off with a trench coat and faceless mask? It's preposterous. And yet, Jim Lee makes it work. This is Gambit's debuted a few months -- if even that -- before this trading card set went into production. That's why his real name (Remy LeBeau) is not listed, and why his bio is a quick three sentences long. At this time in the comics, Gambit had joined a makeshift team of X-Men easily put his agility (3) to work, but definitely didn't rely on him to lift anything. He was probably too busy carrying the entire team's style. It's only appropriate after that last entry that we now show the X-Man most tied to Gambit -- Rogue -- in a card created before the two had even met! This is another Art Adams classic, packed with more detail and texture than nearly every other card in the set. Art Adams knows how to do a lot with a very small canvas The card depicts Roque in one of her Outback-era outfits from a few years prior; at this time in the comics, she was basically flying around the Fats aren't too shabby either. Her extensive bio mainly covers her general status quo at the time, touching on the fact that she possesses the powers of Ms. Marvel (Carol Danvers) in addition to her own power/life sucking abilities. The card could have gotten into how she turned over control of her body to Ms. Marvel for a while, or how she turned over control of her body to Ms. Marvel for a while, or how she turned over control of her body to Ms. Marvel for a while, or how she turned over control of her body to Ms. Marvel for a while, or how she turned over control of her body to Ms. Marvel for a while about Mystique! This series also marked the trading card debut of Mojo, a character portrait that you're probably glad is only the size of a small trading card (and probably annoyed that we've blown it up to laptop-monitor size). A member of the spineless ones, this other-dimensional entertainment mogul/slavedriver rules his own entertainment-obsessed realm and has an incredibly... confusing aesthetic. Spindly spider legs and electrical cable "hair" and a robot scorpion tail? Pick one, Mojo! Sheesh! Mojo made the cut for this list of notable Marvel Universe II cards because of his power ratings: he's the least powerful character in the entire set. Sure he's smarter than average (and Daredevil), but he's weak, slow and clumsy. He's also about as durable as you or me; a sharp jab to his enormous matter will make him flinch at best and bruise him at worst. And no wonder his height are unknown; who'd want to get close enough to this evil jerk to find out either of those? Over 20 years before Nebula got the biggest exposure of her life in 2014's "Guardianse" of her life in 2014's of the Galaxy," she got her very first trading card. The ruthless blue-hued space pirate is shown here piloting her own ship, in a very casual manner. If this doesn't exactly look like the character Karen Gillan played in the Marvel movie, don't worry; she shaved her head and got even more cybernetic upgrades later, because it was the '90s, let's be honest. Move over Mojo, there's a new smarty in town -- and her name is Nebula! Around this time, Nebula had just finished a multi-issue assault on the Avengers and had a more-than-supporting role in a little story called "Infinity Gauntlet." The information on this card also drops the little tidbit about Nebula believing herself to be the granddaughter of Thanos; the film would take that a step further and establish Karen Gillan's Nebula as the Mad Titan's adopted daughter. Speak of the devil -- here's Thanos himself. As you'll note, this isn't the typical cackling-with-a-fist-or-palm-raised-in-the-air post you so often see on super-villain trading cards. Instead, Thanos stands still, a slight smile on his face and his arms casually behind him. Next to him is his lady love, Death, decked out in her best robe, looking pretty nervous about her would-be suitor. Thanos is depicted here in what can only be described as a horrifying promo photo from hell. With "Infinity Gauntlet" sweeping through comic book shops in 1991, its no wonder why this set seems so cosmic-heavy. That's one reason why Thanos' card made the cut. Then there's the other reason: just look at those powerful character in the entire set. Dude's rocking three 7s here. Who cares if he can't flip around like Daredevil? He can't flip up Thanos as the biggest bad of them all, this is why. SPOILER ALERT if you haven't seen "Doctor Strange" yet, but this card right here demonstrates what fans have known ever since Chiwetel Ejiofor was cast in the role of Mordo in the feature film. Baron Mordo is one bad dude. While the two spend the film as buddies, the post-credits scene sets them up for an adversarial relationship way more familiar to people who have read the comics... or are familiar with this trading card. The run through of Strange and Mordo's first encounter and ensuing battle reads like an alternate version of the script for the "Doctor Strange" film. Almost all of that takes place in the movie, except the Baron Mordo role in the comics is divided up into Ejiofor's Mordo and Kaecilius (Mads Mikkelsen). And while the comic book movies are rarely strictly based on the source material, it's very likely that you'll see a battle between Strange and Mordo in the still-unannounced "Doctor Strange" sequel. The previous Marvel Universe set was packed with jokes, as we discovered in the previous entry. There were cards for Aunt May and Stan Lee, and even a subset of cards dedicated to comic-strip style jokes starring Spider-Man. This set is way more serious; there aren't any real outright comedy cards this time around -- although the site of J. Jonah Jameson with a webbed over mouth is pretty funny. Still, this card depicting the wall-crawler fighting against the media man is about as lighthearted as this set gets. As slightly humorous as the front may be, this one is all business on the back. Yeah, Spider-Man and Jameson hate each other, and this card lays out that beef in a pretty straightforward manner. No matter how hard Spidey tries, nothing he does can convince JJJ that he's an good guy. Of course, Spidey has the last laugh here, seeing as how he's really Daily Bugle photographer Peter Parker and it's Jameson that's really paying to keep Spidey in web fluid and new suits.
